Twenty-Eighth Sunday in Ordinary Time

Saint Pope Paul VI, Mission Sunday 1971

The People of God is a missionary people.

Christ could have asked his Father, and he would have immediately placed at his disposal 'more than twelve legions of angels' (Mt 26:53) to proclaim his redemption to the world. On purpose, in order to proclaim the Good News to humanity, He did not want to use any other voice than ours.

It is up to us, then, to proclaim the Gospel in this extraordinary period of human history, a truly unprecedented time, in which, with heights of progress never before reached, are associated with abysses of perplexity and despair that are also unprecedented. If ever there was a time when Christians, more than ever before, are called to be a light that illuminates the world, a city set on a mountain, salt that gives flavour to the lives of men (Mt 5:13-14), this, undoubtedly, is our time. We, in fact, possess the antidote to the pessimism, the dark omens, the discouragement and fear from which our time suffers.

The Good News is this: God loves us, he became man so that he could share our life and so that we could participate in his. He walks with us – every step of our way – making our distress his own, because he cares for us (1 Pt 5:7). Therefore, men are not alone, because God is present in all their history, that of peoples and that of individuals; and He will lead us, if we will allow Him, to an eternal happiness beyond all human hope.
